NEWS

Gold price (XAU/USD) is poised to end the week on a lower note as economic data from the United States (US) and progress in trade deals with the latter weighed on safe-haven demand, driving the yellow metal lower. Additionally, the Greenback recovered some ground despite falling US Treasury yields. At the time of writing, the XAU/USD trades at $3,336, down almost 1%.

Next week, the Federal Reserve (Fed) is expected to hold rates unchanged at the 4.25%-4.50% range for the fifth time this year. Data released during the month justified the Fed's case to maintain the current policy stance after Initial Jobless Claims dipped for the fourth consecutive week, highlighting the strength of the jobs market. Meanwhile, Durable Goods Orders plunged on Friday, sparked by a drop in aircraft orders.

West Texas Intermediate (WTI) is under pressure on Friday as markets respond to a growing global supply outlook and remain cautious on demand prospects.

At the time of writing, WTI is trading below $65.00, with daily losses exceeding 1.50%.

The market is reacting to the prospect that Venezuela could resume Oil exports, following the US decision to reinstate Chevron's license to operate in the country.

The EUR/USD finished the week up by nearly 1% on Friday, yet ended the daily session flat, following economic data from the United States (US) that was worse than expected, but offset by positive trade news. With the Greenback cutting losses, the pair trades at 1.1741 virtually unchanged.

United States (US) President Donald Trump proudly declared an impending trade deal between the US and Japan earlier this week, touting an arrangement that would see US importers pay a much milder 15% tariff fee on all goods imported from Japan compared to the threatened 25% level that President Trump initially brought to the table. Despite Donald Trump's assurances earlier this week, Japan may not be as eager to give up 90% of the profits, in perpetuity, from a $550B investment in US-based businesses in exchange for slightly lower tariffs on Japanese goods.

The Japanese Yen (JPY) is weakening against the US Dollar (USD) on Friday as risk-on sentiment and widening interest rate differentials continue to pressure the Yen.

At the time of writing, USD/JPY is trading back above 147.00, with the June swing high at 148.03 acting as immediate resistance.

Monetary policy divergence and interest rate differentials remain in focus ahead of Federal Reserve (Fed) and Bank of Japan (BoJ) decisions

The US Dollar (USD) trades with a positive tone for the second straight day on Friday, drawing strength from upbeat US economic data and fresh optimism on trade. On Thursday, better-than-expected weekly Initial Jobless Claims and steady Purchasing Managers Index (PMI) figures helped ease recession worries, supporting the view that the US economy remains resilient. At the same time, recent progress on bilateral tariff deals between the United States (US) and Japan, Indonesia, and the Philippines has improved risk sentiment, thereby limiting pressure on the Greenback.

The EUR's resilience has stemmed from the optimism triggered by the relaxation in Germany's debt brake in March and by the broad-based assumption that this was a game changing event for the region. The EUR was boosted further by the rotation out of US assets triggered by fears that Trump's tariffs could push the US into recession and trigger a spike in inflation.

The Australian Dollar (AUD) is losing ground against the US Dollar (USD) on Friday, pressured by rising US Treasury yields that continue to support demand for the Greenback.

After climbing to a year-to-date high of 0.6625 on Thursday, AUD/USD has slipped, trading below 0.6600 at the time of writing.

The GBP/USD tumbles to a day's low after clearing the 1.3500 figure, following economic data from the United States (US) that justified the Federal Reserve's need to maintain its current monetary policy. Conversely, UK Retail Sales disappointed investors after missing the mark. The pair trades at 1.3434, down 0.52%.

CURRENCY ANALYSIS

EURUSD:

After ECB on-hold decision, it is the Federal Reserve's turn.

Europe and the United States will release fresh inflation and growth estimates.

EUR/USD resumed its bullish trend after correcting long-term overbought conditions.

The EUR/USD pair resumed its bullish trend and settled at around 1.1730, extending its recovery from the monthly low set at 1.1555 on July 17. The pair peaked at 1.1789 amid mounting pressure on Federal Reserve (Fed) Chair Jerome Powell to resign and progress in trade negotiations.

The weekly chart shows that the EUR/USD pair is well-positioned to resume its advance after correcting overbought conditions. The pair keeps developing far above all its moving averages, with a bullish 20 Simple Moving Average (SMA) maintaining its strong upward slope at around 1.1350, far above directionless 100 and 200 SMAs. At the same time, technical indicators pared their latest decline and timidly resumed their advances. The Momentum indicator stands right above its 100 line, while the Relative Strength Index (RSI) flirts again with overbought readings, both hinting at additional gains ahead.

According to the daily chart, EUR/USD is in a consolidative phase. The pair showed little action in the last three trading days, while resting above a now flat 20 SMA. The latter acts as dynamic support at around 1.1710. The Momentum indicator, in the meantime, heads nowhere at around its 100 level, while the RSI indicator aims marginally lower at around 58. Finally, the 100 and 200 SMAs head firmly north, far below the current level, in line with the longer-term bullish trend.

Below the 1.1700 mark, the pair could ease toward the 1.1620 price zone, en route to its July low at 1.1550. Beyond the latter lies a critical long-term support area around 1.1470, a line in the sand for the current bullish trend. To the upside, 1.1830, the 2025 high, comes as immediate resistance en route to the 1.1900 mark.

CURRENCY ANALYSIS

GBPUSD:

The Pound Sterling booked a weekly gain as the US Dollar resumed its downtrend. GBP/USD traders brace for a data-heavy US calendar, while trade headlines will continue to be in focus. Technically, the bias has turned in favor of GBP/USD sellers, with the daily RSI flipping bearish. The Pound Sterling (GBP) staged a solid comeback from two-month lows against the US Dollar (USD) before GBP/USD buyers ran into the 1.3600 hurdle.

The daily chart shows that the GBP/USD pair failed to resist above the short-term 21-day Simple Moving Average (SMA), then near 1.3575, and came under intense selling pressure.

The renewed downside prompted the major to breach the 50-day SMA support at 1.3530, initiating a fresh downtrend.

The next strong support is seen at the July 16 low of 1.3365, below which the 1.3325-1.3300 demand area will be tested. That zone is the confluence of the 100-day SMA and the round level.

The mid-May low near 1.3250 could emerge as a tough nut to crack for sellers.

The 14-day Relative Strength Index (RSI) points lower below the midline, currently near 47, suggesting that sellers will likely retain control going forward.

Alternatively, strong resistance aligns near the 1.3600 threshold, above which the February 2022 high at 1.3643 must be decisively scaled.

GBP/USD breached the critical previous resistance-turned-support of the February 2022 high at 1.3643 on a sustained basis on Monday, paving the way for more bearishness.

The next topside hurdle is located at the 1.3700, followed by the 1.3750 psychological barrier.
